Commentary

The Liontrust Global Alpha Fund returned +1.18% (net after fees) for the month of June following a strong June quarter return of +7.86%.

Key market highlights for the month:

- Although global equities ended June lower, weighed down by a sell-off in large-cap technology stocks, equities delivered their strongest quarterly performance since the post-pandemic rebound of 2020.

- The key feature of the second quarter was a broadening of equity market leadership across regions, even as the underlying drivers of performance remained concentrated around AI-related investment.

- Semiconductor-related companies remained at the centre of investor attention. The Philadelphia Semiconductor Index (SOXX) rose 95% during the second quarter, driven by strong demand for AI infrastructure. More than half of global equity market returns during the quarter were generated by a small group of companies exposed to the AI value chain, particularly in memory, semiconductor fabrication and equipment manufacturing.

Portfolio review:

The strongest contributors on the long side were Seagate Technology, Hewlett Packard Enterprise and Credo Technology, all of which benefited from continued enthusiasm around AI infrastructure spending. Within the short book, positions in Soitec, Husqvarna, Booz Allen Hamilton and HP Inc. generated positive returns as company-specific fundamentals weakened or market expectations were revised lower.

Losses were concentrated in a handful of long positions. Firefly Aerospace was the largest detractor as investors took profits and rotated capital towards the highly anticipated SpaceX IPO. Microsoft, Amazon, Alphabet and ServiceNow also detracted, reflecting weakness across parts of the large-cap technology and software universe during the month. Energy-related holdings including SLB, TGS and Viridien were a further headwind as oil prices fell sharply and sentiment towards energy services companies weakened.

While the short book did not fully offset losses from the long portfolio, its positive contribution was encouraging given the considerable stock-level dispersion observed across global equity markets during the month

Outlook:

The outlook for the second half of 2026 is likely to be heavily influenced by the durability of the AI investment cycle. While macroeconomic developments, interest rates and economic growth remain important considerations, AI-related capital expenditure continues to be the dominant driver of market leadership across the US, Taiwan and Korea.

As a consequence, we are beginning to see clear investment opportunities emerge both in support of, and as a result of, the AI spending theme. After years of being the primary recipients of retail and passive investment flows, several of the Mag7 companies are increasingly being viewed as potential losers from an industry spending cycle that may pressure free cash flow generation and challenge existing valuation assumptions.
